Coronations belong to all ages and all races. Somewhere in the records of an Eastern traveler is a graphic picture of the installation of the Emperor of the Tartars on August 24, 1426. Kuyuk Khan sat in his gilt chair outside of a golden tent upon a river bank, and the Tartar chiefs, gathering before him, prayed and commanded that "you have power and dominion over us."

Notice is likewise given that after the explanation of three weeks from the date Khan replied: "If you wish that I be of this notice, the property conveyed by him, prayed and commanded that "you have power and dominion over us."

Rising from his gilt chair, Kuyuk Khan replied: "If you wish that I be your king, are you resolved and disposed each of you to do all that I shall command, to come when I call, to go when I send and to kill whom I shall order to be killed?" "Yes." said the chiefs; and after the King had promised that henceforth his word alone should be his sword, the Emperor was addressed, as follows; "Look on high and see God, and look down on the felt whereon thou sittest. If thou dost govern well thou shalt reign in power and ern well thou shalt reign in power and magnificence, and the whole earth shall magnificence, and the whole earth shall be subject to thee; but if III, thou shalt be poor, miserable, vile and contemptible, and shalt not have power even over the felt whereon thou sittest."
